

The Special Relationship. An Interview with Hillary Clinton

- John Problem: This exclusive interview with you, Madame Secretary, will be greatly appreciated by our readers.
- Hillary Clinton: It's a pleasure, Jarn.
- John Problem: Of course, they want to know if the special relationship between Britain and the USA is still in place.
- Hillary Clinton: Why, sure it is. Always will be. There are very strong ties between our two great nations.
- John Problem: But your recent visit to Argentina seemed to the British Press ill advised at the present time.
- Hillary Clinton: Your media are amazing! What the heck! I was just down there saying 'hi' to their lovely President.
- John Problem: But the subject of the Falklands must have come up?
- Hillary Clinton: The where?
- John Problem: The islands near Argentina that are a British possession.
- Hillary Clinton: Oh yeah! You mean the Malvinas. Yeah, that came up. They seem to have a problem with you guys prospecting for oil and stuff.
- John Problem: Apparently so. It's reported that you said it would be sensible for the two countries to resolve their differences between themselves.
- Hillary Clinton: Uh, yeah. That's right.
- John Problem: And that you appeared sympathetic to their view. People in Britain feel that does not show evidence of a special relationship.
- Hillary Clinton: Jarn, The world has moved on since the 80s. We live in a multeye global world, a multeye cultural world, a world in which everything is goddam multeye - I mean where everything needs careful consideration for others and their interests and views. Where they're coming from, ya know. We in America have forged new links with South America and we have to respect those. Argentina is part of South America, right? So there you go. The mission of the USA is to forge links with most nations in the interests of peace and welfare. Lookit, we're even getting cosy with the French, for Heaven's sake!
