

Overheard at the Kraft Boardroom lunch.

"Hey, Irene, ain't ya scared? Those Brits, the god-damned Prime Minister no less , says you better be careful. Their crummy Times newspaper said he fired a warning shot at us. No kidding! A warning shot! He said he was determined then when people are worried about their jobs, that jobs in Cadbury can be secure. Is that some kind of British gobbledegook? What does it mean? It gets stupider yet, believe me! One of their wacky Lords got up and said that if Kraft think they can make a fast buck out of Cadbury's they'd better be ready for strong opposition from the local folks and the British government. Oh wow! The local yokels! And their rinky-dink government! Do they have capitalism over there? What's the government gonna do? Come over here and threaten us? With what? 'I say, chaps, can't have you buying up our choccies, you know.' Gimme a break! And did you see that total jerk on Sky? An MP or something'. He said the people of Britain should decide if they want a foreign takeover of Cadbury! The people! Geez! It makes you wonder if we wanna get mixed up with these guys....."